KITCHENER RALLIED
BRITAIN FOR WAR;
QUADRUPLED ARMY

Declaration of war "K. of K." was appointed Secretary of State for War and immediately England knew that a great dynamic of ability and energy was at the head of the military arm of the nation.

With "K. of K." directing the campaign the people of Britain felt secure and the news of Khartoum, India and South Africa lost no time in demonstrating the fact that he had not only a head of his ability as an organizer, he proceeded to organize the largest volunteer army the world has ever seen, and within a year from the outbreak of the conflict the ranks were quadrupled by an increase from less than 1,000,000 to 4,000,000 fighting men. The other great powers in the war had entered the conflict with large standing armies or compulsory military service, and it was Kitchener's task to do in a few months what the other nations had accomplished in years.

It was Kitchener who coldly informed the British people that they were facing the greatest crisis in their history. He quickly dispelled the smug opinion that British arms could not know defeat, and grimly informed them that they had not entered a war of months, but one of years, and then he proceeded to work great changes in the personnel of the War Department. Honeycombed as it was with social and political favorites, the man of iron proceeded to make of the British War Department a bureau of experts, of soldiers.

After Kitchener had despatched all the available regulars to the continent he plunged into his campaign for recruiting volunteers to the colors. He literally plastered the British Isles with posters calling upon all men of military age to fight for their country. And not content with directing the recruiting campaign "K. of K." went through the country personally drilling the volunteers. Within a year of the war's opening Kitchener's work was told of in Parliament when Premier Asquith announced that about 2,000,000 men had enlisted in the United Kingdom alone and almost another million in the overseas dominions.

As the war progressed, however, Kitchener for the first time in his long military career became the object of severe criticism. He was held responsible for the shortage of artillery ammunition and was charged with gross shortsightedness in not having provided sufficient supplies of heavy shells. The upshot of the criticism was the creation of the Ministry of Munitions, with David Lloyd George at its head.

ENFORCED CENSORSHIP ON ALL NEWS.

This was followed by the appointment of Sir William Robertson as Chief of the Imperial Staff in December of last year. This appointment greatly lessened the duties of "K. of K." In December rumors were rife of friction between Kitchener and Field Marshal French, commanding the British forces in France. The result of the trouble was the relinquishing of the command by Gen. French.

It was Kitchener who was responsible for the close censorship of news relating to the movement of British troops and even of happenings in England. There were many who felt that he was carrying the policy of secrecy too far, but Kitchener, as in all things he ever undertook, was obdurate and he had his way. The censorship he established has been such that within the last few weeks but little news has come to this country as to his own movements.

KEPT HIS OWN COUNSEL AND HAD FEW FRIENDS.

Kitchener of Khartoum ever kept his own counsel. Few men or women could rate themselves as his close friends. His associates were rather admiring acquaintances than friends. He carried his policy of being his own counselor to such an extent that he never married, maintaining that a soldier had no business with a wife.

Kitchener served his rulers and country for more than forty years, and was never found wanting in any duty that was assigned to him. Born at Gainsborough House, some three miles from the town of Listowel in County Kerry, Ireland, on June 24, 1850, Kitchener early formed a liking for the army, having inherited a desire for military matters from his father, Lieut. Col. H. H. Kitchener. Although he was not of Irish stock, Kitchener was proud to claim the Emerald Isle as his place of birth.

Kitchener's father, an Englishman, had purchased large estates in Ireland following the Irish famine of 1847 and moved from his home in Leicestershire, England, in 1848. The boyhood of the future Earl Kitchener was spent in County Kerry. At the age of thirteen he was sent to school at Grand Clos, Villeneuve, on the shores of Lake Geneva, Switzerland. In 1868 Kitchener entered the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, England, where he quickly demonstrated his aptitude for mathematics and military problems.

While a student at the military school the Franco-Prussian War broke out, and young Kitchener asked for and received permission to ally himself with the French troops. In 1874, when a British expedition was sent to survey Western Palestine, young Kitchener was one of the eager volunteers accepted for the service.

Young Kitchener was next sent to the island of Cyprus. Here he took his first step that was eventually to lead him to Khartoum and everlasting fame as an English soldier.

KITCHENER'S WORK IN THE EGYPTIAN CAMPAIGNS.

Kitchener was a member of Sir Herbert Stewart's desert column, which sought to take relief to Gen. (Chinese) Gordon, penned up in Khartoum. Kitchener saw a great amount of fighting against the derviches in Southern Egypt, and in 1886, when he was made governor of the Red Sea territories, he began a campaign against the notorious Osman Digna, the dervish leader. It was during one of these raids that Kitchener's command was flanked by the enemy and put to flight, in the midst of which his jaw was broken by a bullet.

Upon a visit home he was received by Queen Victoria and nominated by her as an aide-de-camp. Later he was appointed Sirdar of the Egyptian army and from that time on he stood foremost in the ranks of England's fighting men.

Kitchener's absolute independence of action marked his career. He was a dominant figure who insisted upon having his own way. Cabinet Ministers or even Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding. He was the man of iron, cold and unyielding. England has had many popular military leaders during Kitchener's time, but none stood out quite so commandingly as did "K. of K."

During his administration as Sirdar of Egypt Kitchener demonstrated his absolute self-confidence and gave the War Office a thrill when he made use of his withering sarcasm because certain rumors he had ordered were not forthcoming. The War Office had suggested a different gun. The man of iron and ice thereupon despatched the following insolent message to his chiefs: "I can throw stones at the dervishes myself."

The guns the iron man had originally requested were forwarded without more ado.

Kitchener built up an army "without stomach, heart or backbone" and made it one of the greatest fighting units the world has ever seen, and with it he fought the battle of Omdurman on Sept. 2, 1898. In this battle he pitched 30,000 troops against 50,000 Mahdists and defeated them. For his triumphs in the Sudan Kitchener was raised to the peerage. Upon Lord Roberts's return to England in 1900 Kitchener assumed command of the campaign against the Boers and virtually ended the South African War. For this work he was made a Viscount and promoted to the rank of general.

Kitchener was sent to India as Commander-in-Chief of the British forces and on leaving India in 1909

he was promoted field marshal. He then returned to Egypt. From this post he assumed charge of the forces in the present war. Kitchener's nature was once summed up by a cockney non-commissioned officer in these words: "He's no talker. Not him. He's all steel and fire."
